As we dashed along the steel highway in the flying car, other scenes came into view, awakening thoughts of progress and of civilization. We had a partial view of the building of the University of Virginia, one of the monuments of the illustrious Jefferson and one of the objects of the pride of the State and of the South. Borne rapidly our next object of interest was the battle ground of Manassas, now happily covered with quiet homes and productive farms, for the sustenance and preservation of man, instead of being the bloody theatre of war's dread machinery of woe. Such scenes in our rapid transit were only the occasional for reflection upon the dark times of '61-'65 and the dreary succession of years from '65 onwards even to our times when we cannot but feel that their disastrous effects of war and hate are still marked in the intellectual and religious fabric of our loved Southland. May our experience of the fearful desolations of such a conflict, wrought in every sphere, ever deter us from rushing madly into such a revolting and irrational method of settling difficulties.

Our next place of study and observation was the city of Washington, and profit. We spent a sufficient amount of our time in Washington to allow of our visiting some of the points of chief interest with which this city abounds, and only regretted that the limits of our time precluded a fuller investigation of its wealth of grandeur and splendor. We can only give our impressions of two of the wonderful sources of advantage and delightful contemplation which we visited. These were the Washington monument and the Capitol.

This is one thing,—this monument about which the whole American heart, of every section North, East, South and West, can rally with affectionate pride as suggesting the deeds of one man who belong to the whole land, and we may say to the whole world. So without being hero worshippers, we make our pilgrimage first of all to the spot which bears aloft the greatness of Washington. It is but befitting to the life and character of this greatest of nature's noblemen that the shaft erected to the perpetuation of his name should rise to a height far beyond any similar monument on the globe. The obelisk was originally intended to reach an altitude of 600 feet. This lofty structure is 55 feet square at its base and the foundation on which it stood was at first 30 feet square, and extended 7 feet, 7 inches below the surface. But as it was found on examination to be a defective foundation, it was determined that safety required it should be enlarged, so that the whole now rests upon an enduring basis of 126 feet 6 inches square, or 24 times greater than the old. The original height was modified in plan and limited to 555 feet and so it stands now, taller than any other in the world. Numerous specimens of ornamental marble have been sent from all parts of the world,—tributes to the memory of the great hero. Some have been

(For the Chronicle)

A summer trip to the higher latitudes is generally a pleasant occupation for the weary toiler. It has proved this season to be exceptionally agreeable by reason of the delightful temperature of the weather as compared with that of the climate of Clarksville, which, during this summer, is reported to have been of extraordinary heat.

It is said by one of our most reliable meteorologists, that for three weeks, the mercury ranged about the mark 90 on any day, and, at least once, attained to 92°. This is very remarkable for Clarksville, as the summers here have usually been comparatively cool and comfortable. At the same period during this season in New England, we had pleasant and bright days, and during a visit there of four weeks, the temperature was cool enough at night to require warm covering with the exception of one or two nights.

The tour performed by us was delightful in the main, while en route while at our first destination, and then on our return via Canada, Chicago, back to Clarksville. By a well-arranged combination of Railways, our tickets issued by the O. & C. R. R., entitled us to travel over Virginia Midland, R. & P. M., Pennsylvania, & N. Y., & N. England Roads, to Boston, which city we reached safely within two and a half days, and two nights and a day.

There were many interesting and attractive scenes and objects presented to us on this route, among which were:

1. The grand mountain scenery of West Virginia. It was a great privilege that we passed through this region in day light. There is no pen capable of adequately describing the grandeur of this scenery; it must be looked upon to be enjoyed. Even then it scarcely appreciates in its sublimity. For while objects giving rise to the feeling of the sublime are under actual observation, and the elevating influence upon the mind is felt and enjoyed by the beholder, at the same time it is impossible to analyze this feeling into its component elements. Nor do we desire to do so, but we abandon ourselves willingly to the absorbing power that pervades every scene, and we are still and voiceless in the presence of nature's majesty. Writers on the emotions have essayed to do this, but their attempts have proved futile and unsatisfactory. All we can say is, as another has said: "The sentiment of the sublime differs from that of the beautiful. The one pleases and delights; the other overcomes and yet elevates." To one who can command the leisure, it is well worth the toil of travel to visit this stupendous scenery, and spend days in gazing upward to the cloud-capped summits, or exploring the cavernous depths which present dark natural tunnels at their base, ever and anon varied by the rustling cataract, tumbling down the almost precipitous sides of the mountain and then calmly sweeping off into the peaceful plain far below, forming the crystal channel of some beautiful river, whose banks are ornamented with the green luxuriance of abundant crops, or the busy hum of some populous city.
